

The dolphin gleefully glided along in the shimmering water. It gazed around its peaceful surroundings and happily chattered away at the evening buzz along the shoreline. It jumped into the air and caught a few glances and points. A little girl raced up to it and talked to it excitedly. The dolphin chattered again but nipped at the young child.

The girl screamed and ran away and the dolphin tilted its head, not sure what it had done wrong. After all, it was just playing. The dolphin shrugged, figuring it was just jumpy child. Years later it found another little girl who wasn't so jumpy. Ecstatic, the pair were fast friends.

This girl didn't flinch at its nips and the dolphin was confident in their communication. Of course this girl knew it was just playing.

One day, the dolphin decided it needed to show the girl a new trick. It nudged her into the water and pushed her under the water, eager to show a new trick. The girl struggled but the dolphin, once again, shrugged it off, frowning. It had thought this girl was different.

It's fine, the dolphin tried to convince the girl as they delved deeper into the water. Still, the girl struggled and before the dolphin even got a chance to complete the trick, a net latched around it and it was pulled away from its friend.

It was released a little while, its friend nowhere in sight and in a completely new location. It swam back the shoreline, looking for its best friend but all that met it was a sign stuck in the sand.

Beware the dolphins. They may try to drown your children.